Abuja Radio Station

I WOULD like to call the attention of the FRCN authorities to Abuja Radio programmes. I cannot understand why this station which can be regarded as the national Radio Station broadcasts all its programmes only in English and Hausa languages.

I wish to ask our policy makers where the so-called Federal character is in these programmes. I feel that Abuja Radio, broadcasting from the Federal Capital City, ought to use the major Nigerian languages as is the case with FRCN Lagos.

Please give prompt attention to this problem.

Editor's Note

ALL Radio Nigeria Stations broadcast their programmes in the main languages of the localities they serve. Radio Nigeria Abuja is therefore not an exception. Radio Nigeria Lagos runs national programmes and so broadcasts in major Nigerian languages. Radio Nigeria Abuja will certainly do the same when the Federal Capital finally moves there.

Standard Of News Coverage

I FIND it surprising that the FRCN with all its numerous branches throughout the country, is not always able to adequately cover local news events. This situation is even worse as regards foreign news coverage.

My assertion is evidenced by the fact that when a news event occurs in Nigeria, it is usually from foreign broadcasting stations that one hears details of it. An example of this is the religious riots that took place in Maiduguri last year.

It was from the BBC in far away London that we heard details of the uprising. This, and many other similar instances in the past, does not place the FRCN in a very high public rating. I would suggest that the Corporation improve its standard of news coverage.

Income Distribution

By

THE Productivity, Prices and Incomes Board which was established by Act 30 of 1977 aims at providing institutional support for the administration of incomes policy in the country. Consequently the Federal Government has regulated wages, salaries and non-wage incomes through an income policy.

The set objectives of this policy include among others, improvements in real income and stabilization of prices. It also concerns the provision of orderly arrangements for the review of wages and salaries.

But in the long run, an incomes policy has as its ultimate goal, the attainment of a fair distribution of incomes in the society. Therefore, it is an instrument of development designed to promote the overall health of the national economy.

In that case incomes policy measures are expected to directly influence movements at all levels of disposable income. The aim here is to moderate price inflation in times of rapid growth and ensure equitable distribution of income as a long-term objective.

Apart from this, incomes policy measures provide the necessary guidelines that determine the movements in the levels of income. Again, it sets the limits and procedure for wage negotiations as well as the distribution of incomes among the factors of production.

According to the second National Development Plan, the absence of an incomes policy may lead to the negation of other developmental efforts and can therefore cause social frustrations. Because of this, the plan envisages the active promotion of a dynamic economy and the establishment of a just and egalitarian society.

It then follows that, the pursuit of economic growth and equity at the same time cannot be successful without an incomes policy.

Another reason is that in a developing economy like ours, there can be no reliance on market forces to achieve the desired equilibrium between incomes and prices. It is therefore through government intervention that any stalemate can be resolved.

In any economy, the question of movements in price levels, changes in income levels and the distribution of incomes and productivity movements are very important. Therefore the pattern of behaviour of these factors are even of more critical importance in our economy where the supply of goods is not always adequate and incomes distribution is unequal.

In a situation like this therefore, an incomes policy has a part to play as it intervenes directly in the processes of wages and price determination.

In its efforts to promote a fairer distribution of income, the Productivity, Prices and Incomes Board has encountered some problems, the greatest of which is lack of necessary data.

As a result of this, decisions are sometimes taken under mere assumptions. But despite all the problems, the Board has a viable incomes policy that is consistent with the country's level of development. It has also addressed itself to the need to improve the standard of living of Nigerians.

Since it was established in 1976, the Board has issued five incomes policy guidelines directed towards bridging the gap between the high income and low income earners.

For instance, during the 1976/77 financial year, a 7% graduated increase in wages was granted to workers whose annual income was not above three thousand naira. Also in 1979, an increase of 10% was granted to workers earning less than three thousand naira per annum.

This meant that between 1976 and 1979, the middle and high income earners did not benefit from any pay increases.

Apart from the Board's efforts on issues relating to wages and salaries, it has also directed its attention on non-salary incomes. From the 1978/79 financial year, efforts were made to control the income of self-employed professionals.

It can therefore be seen that the Board's income guidelines have led to a fairer distribution of incomes in favour of the low income group.

Funding The Universities

By Fred-Gusha .

THE rapid rate at which new universities are springing up in the country is fast worsening the problem of providing adequate funds for their running.

The old university of Ibadan was forced to defer its reopening date for the 1982/83 session to December because of lack of funds. At the University of Nigeria, Nsukka, lecturers went on strike over lack of office and classroom accommodation as well as inadequate equipment. And while the Federal Government blamed the universities for poor management of funds, they maintained that they were not given enough.

But the important issue should not be who must bear the blame for the poor state into which the universities have fallen. Rather it should be the concern of both parties to seek long-lasting solutions to the problem.

As for the universities, it should be obvious to them that the time has now come when they must cease to fold their hands and wait for the Federal Government to fend for all their financial needs. This has weakened their efforts to strive at self-reliance.

Besides, with a glut enveloping the international oil market, the national economy has been greatly weakened. At the same time, demands on it continue to increase. In such circumstances some dependencies of the Federal Government must have to seek for funds on their own to supplement what the centre can provide.

One would have expected at least the older universities like Ibadan and Nsukka to have established fund-generating ventures so that if and when the Federal Government was hard-pressed in fulfilling its obligations to them, they could readily have something at hand to fall back on.

But surprisingly, these institutions cry up to the Federal Government over trivial things like housing and office accommodation after all their long years of existence. Some of them still rent houses at exorbitant costs for their staff so that at the end of the year, the rents consume far larger sums of money than would have been used in erecting permanent structures. Such practices cannot help attracting criticisms of poor management of funds.

It is ironical that the university of Ibadan still experiences the same teething problems as the new universities. As the nation's first university, if it had embarked on any meaningful planning in the 29 years of its existence, it should not have found itself in its current situation.

The present times therefore call on the universities to be austere in their expenditures while at the same time scouting for possible areas in which they can find money. The University of Maiduguri for instance provides legal consultancy services to the public and this yields some revenue into its purse. Other universities could set up similar services in such areas as agriculture, commerce, industry, science and technology. There is always a market for their research findings.

On her part, the Federal Government needs to review her policy on university funding. The long delays in disbursing money to the institution must be stopped since this places them in too many financial hardships. It is to be hoped that with the separate head of expenditure that has been created for the National Universities Commission, things will improve. Also in future, the split in the takings should closely reflect student enrolment as well as staff strength if it is to be meaningful.

Perhaps one must point out that it is not a very sound policy to continue to establish more universities under a groaning economy and when already existing ones are poorly equipped and some even under-staffed. Establishing new universities will only aggravate the problem of funding them. It would have been much cheaper to expand and properly equip the existing ones so as to increase their enrolment capacities as well as improving the quality of the training they provide. Universities should be established in response to the manpower needs of the nation and the level of economic growth.

The solutions to the problem of funding our universities must however not be seen to lie only with the government and the institutions themselves. Private individuals and Organisations too have a role to play since it is not only the government that needs to provide services to university graduates. It is also the President has called on wealthy individuals to contribute to government efforts in financing the running of the universities. Such contributions could take the form of research grants.

PIRACY IN MUSIC INDUSTRY

By Aloysius Ibeabuchi

THE copy-right law is supposed to protect the works of authors and composers so long as these people have obtained the sole legal right to print, publish, sell, broadcast, perform or record their works. It is this sole legal right that is called copy-right.

There exists in this country a copy-right law. But it would seem that a great majority of people are not aware of it. Otherwise how can one explain the prevailing large-scale infringement of this law with reckless impunity?

A few hours after a record is released in the market by the recording company, illegally reproduced cassette and stereo cartridge versions flood the markets. And the bold and open manner in which this act of piracy is carried out appears to give it a stamp of legality.

Until recently, it was generally thought that the only victims of the act were the musicians and the recording companies. But the discovery by the Police last year of an illegal workshop with sophisticated printing machines for reproducing text books and novels shows that writers and book publishing companies are also being duped of their royalties.

If the unmindful way this crime is committed is not a function of the ignorance of the copy-right law by the culprits, could it then be that the penalties prescribed by the law are not stiff enough? Or has the legislation itself never been enforced? Some may say the answer lies in all the three reasons.

The penalty stipulated by the copy-right law is a fine of one hundred naira or a prison term of one month for anybody convicted of the offence. And regarding enforcement, it is doubtful if any of the numerous record and book pirates has ever been prosecuted.

This situation, led to the formation of the Performing Musicians Association of Nigeria which took the initiative to prevail on the National Assembly to review the existing copy-right law with a view to giving it more bite. The association and the recording companies want a stop further to establish an anti-piracy task-force but this also appears to have made little impact on the battle against the crime.

The problems created by the flagrant disrespect for the copy-right law in Nigeria today are numerous. First, it brought about mistrust between the companies and the artistes who believed that they were being fraudulently undercut in terms of financial rewards by the companies. Then there is the resultant revenue loss. The Federal Government is said to be losing an estimated N900m yearly through illegal recordings. The musicians, authors and companies also incur financial losses of course and this has resulted in staff retrenchment, by the companies particularly in these days of economic recession.

While all these are going on, the pirate who requires little or no capital outlay to set up his illegal but lucrative business disposes of his wares at ridiculously cheap prices.

The battle against record piracy, it seems, would have to be waged from many fronts to succeed. And it will be necessary for the musicians to purge themselves of this crime first before going out. It is common knowledge that many of them adopt the works of other artistes without regard to the copy-right law.

In the final analysis, it is obvious that piracy in the music and book industries must be checked and urgently too.

Banking Services

—Their Place In National Development

By

Winston Akpabio

Banks are recognised world-wide as very vital institutions for the economic development of any nation. This is why in Nigeria, the government has shown considerable interest in the growth, expansion and operation of the banks.

For instance, the Federal Government has shares in most of the existing banks in the country and has evolved a rural banking policy designed to encourage the commercial banks to establish branches in the rural areas. The programme has helped to open up avenues for investment and the mobilization of savings in the rural areas.

At present, there are some 30 banks in Nigeria with a total of more than 500 branches. And indications are that there will be more commercial and merchant banks in the next few years as well as new branches of existing ones. The Federal Government has also issued guidelines to the banks from time to time to get them to contribute towards the development of the country's industrial, economic and agricultural sectors.

The resilience of the Nigerian economy has never been in doubt, but it requires, all the same, effective lubrication by the banks and other financial institutions to make the country achieve that much sought after self-reliance and confidence which are associated with the advanced economies of the world.

It is obvious that the economic measures taken by the present administration in a bid to revamp the nation's economy in the wake of global recession will be meaningless without the co-operation of the banks.

While commending the progress made so far in banking services in the country, the Nigerian Bankers should now begin to place emphasis on development rather than mere growth as the over-all objective. The banks, and indeed all financial institutions should raise their contributions to the development of the domestic capital market especially in the area of investment in government projects.

This is more so when the govern-pursued through effective mobilisation and recycling of funds and through resource allocation.

The quality of services rendered to customers by banks in the country needs to be checked thoroughly to promote banking success and therefore that of the economy.

It is common practice in some banks to keep customers waiting on end before cash is withdrawn, while deposits are quickly received from them. Bank officials should bear in mind always that time means money.

And considering the rapid rise in economic activities, the increasing volume of financial transactions as well as the high sophistication of the monetary and financial world, there is need for continuous training of bank officials if our banks are to keep pace with the challenges of modern banking.

LEGISLATIVE ABSENTEEISM

—Will a Six-Year Term Solve The Problem?

THE Nigerian constitution stipulates that if an objection is made by any member of the National Assembly that there are present in the house of which he is a member, fewer than one-third of the members of that house, and that it is not proper for the house to transact business, the presiding officer shall adjourn the house. The adjournment will come if after a prescribed interval there is still less than one-third of all the members of the house.

Interpreted ordinarily, this means that the House could conduct business with less than one-third of its members present so long as no member raises the question of a quorum. Indeed, both the Senate and the House of Representatives are known to have conducted legitimate business on many days with less than one-third of their members in attendance.

The numerical strength of the Senate is 95 and that of the House of Representatives is 450. However, there are a number of vacancies in both houses resulting from deaths and resignations. In full capacity, the quorum in the Senate will not be less than 31 members while 150 members will constitute a quorum in the House of Representatives. Had the constitution stipulated two-thirds as the quorum in both arms of the National Assembly, it is doubtful if the legislatures would ever have been able to meet the minimum of 181 sitting days prescribed by the supreme law of the land.

The problem of absenteeism in the National Assembly is usually attributed to the on-going preparations by the Political Parties for this year's elections. Most of the legislators go back to their constituencies either canvassing for their renomination or participating in the nomination of other candidates.

This state of affairs brings to mind the suggestion made by the Senate President that the life of the Senate be extended by two years. Dr. Wavay contended that a six-year term, under which half of the Senators would seek a fresh mandate every three years would ensure continuity and prevent a vacuum in the Senate at the end of every term.

The present experience surely makes that proposal very attractive even to those who had opposed it before. But will it really provide the answer to the serious problems of absenteeism among our lawmakers? Will the fact that a legislator is not immediately standing for renomination stop him from getting actively involved in his party's preparations for elections?

The strong possibility that even this system might not improve the level of attendance in the assemblies in election years gives rise to a suggestion that party elections or nomination exercises be held when the legislative houses are on their long recess. Since this lasts for about three months, it is the considered opinion of many that the timing of the primaries by the parties to fall within this period would improve attendance by the lawmakers.

There is also the view that the presence of independent candidates in the various houses would have made some difference since all they need do, apart from electioneering campaign, is to file their election papers with the FEDECO at the appropriate time. In other words, the independent candidate will not be affected by the distractions of party conventions, nominations and primaries.

Whether or not this will contribute to solving the problem is debatable. What is certain is that something has to be done to ensure that the two houses of the National Assembly have the minimum of one-third of their members in attendance when in session. The alternative will be needless delays in passing vital bills such as the Appropriation Bill or the passage of bills after uninspiring and inexhaustive debates due to the absence of a majority of the legislators.

OCTOBER LECTURES

National Plan And Water Supply

In this issue, we bring you the third in the series of lectures delivered by Dr. Bankole Martins at the FRCN historic annual October Lectures. So far, we have carried 'Place of Water In Human Existence' and the Use and Adequacy of Water! The third, which is titled 'The National Plan and Water Supply' is an in-depth examination of government efforts to solve the chronic problem of water supply that faces our nation.

In this talk, I will consider the role of water supply in our national planning from the historical point of view as well as present perspectives and future goals.

Prior to the late sixties, the Nigerian economy was virtually wholly agricultural and export-oriented. Since water is a primary input to the agricultural sector of the economy, one would have expected an aggressive and protective national policy concerning water resources. The records, however, do not reflect such an attitude or policy.

Although there was an effective and closely monitored hydrological network in Nigeria, it was lopsided. The information gathered were either filed away or published for general information by way of hydrological yearbooks; it did not serve as a basis either for the awakening of water supply shortage awareness or for the formulation of a national water resources policy. This does not mean that there were no periods of drought and relative famine prior to the late sixties; in fact evidence abounds that there were.

Our national history of water resources awareness has been one of the "hydrological cycle". But what is the hydrological cycle? The hydrological cycle postulates that when the nation experiences normal rainfall, there is general apathy until a period of relative drought ensues. If the drought is sufficiently prolonged, public awareness and the need for constant water supply grow. Depending on the length of the drought, the awareness leads to concern and ultimately a state of panic results, if no relief is available.

Usually people blame government for not having adequate and realistic water resources policy and a movement emerges for appropriate legislation to correct such ills. Invariably, the rains finally come during this period and the movement's energy is dissipated in complacency and euphoria resulting from the relief. Once again, apathy sets in only to be shaken when the next drought appears. And so continues the hydrological cycle.

The turning point in the vicious cycle in this country came as a result of the severe drought that ravished and decimated the Sahel region, from the late sixties to the mid-seventies. The Northern half of the country was severely affected and millions of livestock perished. Agricultural harvests were very lean and thousands of people died of hunger and starvation; these in turn led to massive migration not only from the Northern parts of this country but remarkably from all the neighbouring countries on the Northern boundary. The resulting misery encouraged the formation of social-pressure groups concerned about the effects of the drought.

A powerful national relief organisation was set up and this received the support and co-operation of the federal government. The government also realised that in order to ensure that such a catastrophe did not repeat itself in the future, necessary steps must be taken to set up and implement a realistic and effective water supply programme. Such a programme would necessarily involve an inventory of the available sources of raw water.

The programme would require feasibility studies as to the desirability and viability of harnessing such sources where development is called for; there would be need for planning, design and construction of engineering works as well as management of the developed water system. With this objective in view, the government then embarked on an aggressive but systematic programme for the development of the water resources in this country.

In doing this, the government adopted the policy that where possible such development would be one that makes conjunctive use of both underground and surface flows. This will be for multi-purpose utilization encompassing not only domestic and industrial water supply but also irrigation, fisheries and power generation.

The federal government felt that this was sufficiently important to justify the creation of a new ministry called the Ministry of Water Resources. Its initial step was to commission feasibility studies so as to identify sources that can be economically developed for water-based or related projects. This took the form of prospecting for underground water in the North whereas in the South it manifested itself in the identification of suitable sites for the construction of dams. This was followed by the engineering design and construction works.

Unfortunately, most of the work had to be done with either very limited or unreliable data; but this was certainly preferable to waiting for another 25 years or more for the right type and quality of data to be available. In pursuing such a programme, our government received assistance by way of technical expertise and equipment from some foreign countries.

Hitherto, the provision of domestic water supply had been basically the responsibility of state governments but this was to change with the introduction of matching grants for water supply in the Third National Development Plan.

The matching grant was a form of subsidy designed to encourage state governments to undertake water supply schemes. In particular, for every Naira invested in such schemes by the state, the federal government contributed a matching Naira. This was a big boost to water supply schemes because, formerly, 60% of the total expenditure on water supply projects were on foreign elements such as pumps, generators, pipes, chemicals and the 50% matching grant went a long way in the foreign component of the fund required.

However, such water supply schemes were invariably limited to urban areas and this tended to accelerate the drift from the rural areas to the urban centres so that by the time they are actually commissioned, the schemes are terribly over-stretched if not obsolete; such population explosion in cities like Lagos have generally rendered all infrastructural facilities inadequate and difficult to maintain.

In spite of the state and federal government efforts, water supply still remains irregular and inadequate in varying degrees in different parts of the country. The problems associated with the efficient running of our water supply development schemes derive from the three components of water supply. These are the problems of production, or availability of rain water, problems of distribution network for the treated water and finally the problem of operation and maintenance of the treatment plant.

The problems of production are few and easily controlled especially in the areas where we have conjunctive use of water resources. For example, in times of drought, surface reservoirs can be augmented by bore-hole production. And once adequate resources have been identified, plans can be made so that their harnessing and development can be aligned with the population growth and other projected as well as anticipated demands. The problems of distribution on the other hand are major bottlenecks in the water supply system in most of our cities.

Not all of these associated problems can be attributed to poor planning; some can be attributed to the illicit connection associated with unapproved development. The massive road construction network that have sprung up in the urban areas within the past decade has invariably led to various damages to both the arterial and secondary pipelines in the water supply network of these cities.

It is therefore usual to find that some areas of a city have water whereas other parts of the same city do not.

The problem of operation and maintenance of the pipeline depends principally on the primary and secondary power supply. Where the electrical power supply is regular and devoid of voltage surges the basic water treatment equipment are likely to be trouble-free and last longer.

However, this is not the case in most of our cities and invariably the stand-by power capacity is usually grossly inadequate. There should be a standardised scheme of preventive maintenance but the production pressure in most of our cities makes this rather impossible to comply with.

The end-result of this is that treatment plants are not properly serviced until they break down and most of the time necessary spare parts are not available. Once in a while, the few plants have had to limit production because of shortage of chemicals but these can be easily controlled where there is adequate planning and stock management.

The picture painted is that most of the problems could be avoided if adequate foresight and planning can be effected. This is only possible if we have the adequate manpower to service the water treatment and supply technology. The cost benefit analysis for potable water supply has high socio-economic returns. It assures better health, makes higher productivity possible and encourages other external economies such as infrastructural development.

However, because of the location of such schemes these benefits have mainly been enjoyed by urban dwellers who comprise less than 25% of the entire population. As an issue of equity, government has the responsibility and indeed a duty to ensure that adequate water supply is enjoyed by all the citizens including the 75% that dwell in the rural areas. For this reason, our government adopted the strategy that concedes the wisdom in taking water to the villages as opposed to attracting the villagers to the cities where water is available.

The first step in the strategy was the creation of The Eleven River Basin Development Authorities as an instrument of rural transformation. One of their functions is the construction of small dams, wells and boreholes for rural water supply schemes.

The civilian administration has instituted another programme specifically geared to improve substantially the amount of domestic water supply in rural areas. This is the national borehole programme introduced during the 1981 Budget Year. According to the programme, the federal government plans to undertake borehole projects in all the states of the federation starting with 40 boreholes in every state during each of 1981 and 1982 Budget Years.

The borehole drillings were preceded by geophysical and geotechnical investigations of chosen sites so to maximize the chances of drilling productive boreholes. This approach illustrates the new philosophy, rational and systematic planning that now form part of the National Water Supply Policy.

STREET TRADING IN NIGERIA

By Toyin Abayomi-Banjo.

FOR those living in urban centres like Lagos, Enugu and Ibadan, street trading has probably become a way of life. On most of the major roads and fly-overs where traffic is thick and where motorists are many, numerous hawkers are to be found making frantic efforts to sell their wares. To these traders, it is a quick way of earning a living even if they do so at great cost to themselves and motorists.

Experience has shown that these hawkers disrupt the flow of traffic as they haggle over the prices of their wares with interested motorists who are naturally forced to reduce speed, consequently forcing those behind them to do likewise. Of importance also is the fact that accidents have become one of the off-shoots of street trading.

Some of these traders recklessly thrust their wares at motorists, forcing them to duck. What is more, motorists haggling with hawkers have been known to lose concentration and control, consequently veering off their lane or inadvertently running into other vehicles. Some of the hawkers have even been knocked down as they attempted to dash across the road to pawn their wares.

The way assorted products surface on the roads coupled with the desperation with which the hawkers try to sell them make some people question how the products were got in the first place. But most of those who patronise them don't seem to be bothered by the legitimacy of the goods. The overriding factor is that they are readily available.

It is however, interesting to note that a number of people have been sold inferior and unusable products in the rush to buy cheaply. And once bought, these goods can't be returned. But those who have taken the trouble to compare the prices of some of the products pawned on the streets with prices of identical products in the department stores have been surprised at the little or no difference in them.

Yet, people patronise the street traders, erroneously carrying over the open market system whereby good bargaining helps to bring down prices. This habit has made street trading flourish. But the traders know that in Lagos for instance, their business is illegal. Apart from the fact that they unpatriotically pay no tax to the government from their sales, they are aware of the law banning street trading especially in Lagos. Yet, they have turned deaf ears on it.

The law stipulates among other things that no person shall hawk or offer for sale any goods or services around specified streets and within the vicinity of any public building in the State. The law also states clearly that any person who contravenes the provisions of the edict is guilty of an offence and is liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding five hundred Naira or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding nine months or both.

Also, any person who buys any goods offered for sale from any unauthorised places other than in the market or approved places, is guilty of an offence. That person is liable on conviction to a fine or imprisonment or both.

Some observers believe that a number of those who pose as traders have more sinister designs on hand. People's doubts are heightened by the way armed robbers emerge on the roads, sometimes in the heat of traffic to snatch cars in broad daylight. People have even been known to mysteriously lose their jewellery and personal belongings in the confusion usually created on the road by hawkers.

It is therefore clear that the issue of street trading is probably being treated with levity by both the traders themselves and law enforcement agents. Given that there might not be enough security men to curb the practice, the country is yet to hear of celebrated cases of offenders being brought to book to serve as a lesson and deterrent to others.

Although it has been suggested that there are probably not enough markets to go round would-be traders, it is unlawful for traders to take the law into their hands by hawking their wares indiscriminately, and even making our roads rowdy.

People cannot be allowed to continue to indulge in what is likely to disrupt public safety and order. There is therefore a need to put a check on the unwholesome practice of street trading in our urban centres.

TRAFFIC CONGESTION

By Atlade Atoyebi

TRAFFIC congestion in many of our towns and cities has remained a topical issue because the problem is of a perennial nature.

In the past few years, there have been attempts to get down to the root of the problem with a view to finding effective solutions to it. A fact that has been widely acknowledged is that our towns and cities were generally unplanned. Many of them cannot cope with the challenges of the moment in that narrow roads were built to meander through their nooks and corners. Also, because of little regard for drainages, some roads are easily washed away in a few days of heavy down pour.

It has been the situation in Lagos. Even where new drainage schemes had been executed, the flood problem on our roads has been worsened by the heap of earth left along the drainage banks. As hundreds of thousands of vehicles were being registered from year to year, it became quite clear that certain measures would have to be taken before the slow movement of traffic came to a halt in some of our cities.

One of the steps taken was the widening of existing roads and the construction of new ones. The result is that many of our state capitals now have dual carriage roads. In extreme cases like in Lagos, kilometres of flyover bridges were built to create more room for the movement of traffic.

In addition to physical construction projects, other steps have already been taken to ensure the smooth flow of traffic in the cities. A special arm of the Police made up of traffic wardens operates at strategic city junctions to keep the traffic moving. Some states especially Oyo and Lagos have created Road Safety Corps units that promptly deal with traffic offences that would have compounded the problem of congestion on our city roads.

And in Lagos, people are used to the law allowing only private cars and mini-buses starting with odd plate numbers to ply certain roads in Lagos on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays. Vehicles beginning with even plate numbers only ply such roads on Tuesdays and Thursdays. The law does not however, apply to Saturdays and Sundays and public holidays.

Taken as a whole, all these measures have greatly reduced the problem of traffic congestion in some cities. However, it has been difficult to sustain this achievement, because of apparent lack of co-operation from road users.

In many of our cities, commercial vehicle operators, have turned certain points on the highway into motor parks, thereby transforming themselves into huge road blocks. For example, at Dugbe in Ibadan, Oshodi, Mile Two, Ojuelegbe and Anthony Bus Stops in Lagos, commercial vehicle operators take and discharge passengers right in the middle of the road, creating nerve-breaking traffic hold-ups.

Nowadays, most of them are undeterred by the presence of law enforcement agents. This is why a lot of people insist that for the country to realise the full benefit of recent investments in road expansion project, decisive steps will have to be taken to deal once and for all with the human problem of this nature.

There is no doubt too, that street trading especially at major bus stops in some of our cities, is a serious impediment to the free flow of traffic. In a place like Lagos, the Police have been fighting a running battle with traders violating the law banning street trading. No sooner are the traders chased off the streets than they return in full force. It has however been suggested that State and Local Governments should build new markets and compel street traders to move into them.

Therefore, judging from the man-hours still being lost, the inconveniences and the sufferings in the crawling traffic, there is every reason to believe that a lot is yet to be done to solve the perennial problem of traffic congestion in our cities. The point that should be stressed is the need to enforce traffic laws to the letter.
